Editor's Letter

As I did in the last issue, I would like to start this edition by thanking subscribers for sticking with us and particularly those generous subscribers who have been able to send donations, both financial and by providing saleable Nationalist memorabilia that can be sold to raise funds. As many of you know, we are running on a shoestring budget to ensure that as many Nationalists, and others, find this magazine affordable. Consequently, whilst printing, material and postage costs seem to be always on the increase we try not to increase the price of Britain, My Nation, although this will be ultimately inevitable ... but not yet! A particular mention this month must go to John Millican, who has been very supportive from day 1 and has recently provided me with several large packages containing magazines, pamphlets, leaflets and books, with the proceeds from selling these being put back into our pot to ensure the price of the Britain, My Nation remains static for the time being. Coincidentally I am also pleased to say that I recently acquired John's book "Mosley's Men In Black: Uniforms, Flags and Insignia of the British Union of Fascists 1932-40 & Union Movement" purchased on Amazon and which provides a splendid insight into the movement nearly a century ago. A review of the book will be included in our magazine at some time in the future.

By the time Edition 9 of Britain, My Nation appears local council and some mayoral elections will have taken place. Several of the larger parties as found on pages 9-12 have already stated their intention to stand candidates. The only advice we can offer Nationalists is obvious in that they should not vote for the mainstream parties but vote for any of our Nationalist parties if they are standing. If there are none, then there is always the option to spoil the ballot paper and write on it the name of the party the voter would have chosen if a candidate was available. It used to be the case, (we are not sure if it still is), that whatever had been written on spoilt papers was read out at the election count, so at least others will hear it. We will be reporting on the elections in our next edition. For all readers involved in election campaigns, we wish you the very best of luck!

On top of the positivity we feel in respect of the elections, and our anticipation that we will have good news to report, there is also much happening within Nationalism in general particularly with the newer parties, several of which are working sensibly to promote our cause and as a consequence are receiving a lot of plaudits on social media. Also we have the great British summer to look forward to and with good weather we always notice an increase in political activity and, again, we are looking forward to reporting good news about our wider Nationalist community. Will 2025 prove to be the beginning of the end for all of the ills that have been inflicted on our nation by Labour, Conservative, Liberal Democrats and all the other anti-British parties with further disarray spreading amongst them? As Trump increases his influence on what is happening in America, the knock-on effect will surely start being noticed here. We already see Starmer and his lackeys pussy-footing around the Trump administration seemingly seeking to curry favour when, we are sure, Trump is laughing at them behind the scenes. Now, more than ever, our political leaders are an embarrassment and laughing stock, not just here, but also around the world. Now, more than ever, is it looking like our breakthrough is on the horizon.

Britain, My Nation will only be available by post on subscription and not via the internet or by email. Articles, letters, newspaper cuttings, and general comments for consideration for inclusion in future editions are welcomed, but please include your name and address if sending items (these will not be published, unless advised otherwise). Please send

We are planning on publishing Britain, My Nation for some time to come, but we can only do so with support from Nationalists within our community. As said above, we are truly grateful for the support and encouragement we have received to date but there is always more we can do, so please make sure you mention Britain, My Nation to your friends, family and political comrades and perhaps request a couple of extra copies that you can distribute as samples. Thank you all once more.

In the News – 1

All readers probably agree that the state of education in this country has reached rock bottom. Some children are leaving school being barely able to read or write whilst our teacher's priorities lie with critical race theory, gender and transgender issues, black history and perverted sexual preferences. However, there is change afoot, as the Government Office for Standards in Education, better known as OFSTED HAVE RECENTLY APPOINTED A NEW CHAIRMAN. So will we see a shake-up in standards and a stricter adherence to traditional teaching methods? Well, the new chairman is Sir Mufti Hamid Patel, pictured right, who was previously the head teacher of Tauheedul Islam Girls' School in Blackburn. GB News reported that Patel urged pupils to 'recite the Koran' and 'wear hijabs outside of school', so whatever changes there might be it surely cannot be for the better. Surely the question has to be asked as to who was responsible for appointing this man and what motivated them to do so. This is a dark day indeed for British education.

Another example of how institutions are attempting to influence the minds of those who seem unable to think for themselves is with the recent screening of the Netflix series called ADOLESCENCE, A BRITISH CRIME DRAMA. The series was allegedly based on a true story and showed the arrest of a 13-year-old boy on suspicion of the murder of a classmate, as a result of viewing toxic material online. However, the perpetrator in the show is a white boy and it has been suggested the story was based on a similar murder by a black boy. Consequently the lasting message from this series is that white boys are broken, dangerous and a threat to society, when it is more often the opposite case. The series has received many plaudits to the extent that Prime Minister Starmer has agreed that the series be shown in all secondary schools by way of a wake-up call, rather than truly addressing the root cause of the problem and how those responsible are brought up believing carrying knives is acceptable.

The show was also written by and starred Stephen Graham, pictured right, who has made much of the racial abuse he suffered in his early life. Apparently Graham has a Jamaican grandfather hence his dark-skinned appearance. Seriously!

Finally we report on the furore caused, yet again, by President Trump who is about to introduce TARIFFS ON ALL GOODS ENTERING THE USA. It seems many deem this to be unacceptable despite the fact that most countries impose tariffs on goods from the USA. Trump, despite not being to everyone's taste, has to be admired for his patriotic stance on all things. With regards the tariffs it will make imports more expensive such that there will be an internal demand for USA produced goods and thereby will stimulate the American economy. As Nationalists it is beholden on us all to purchase goods and services that originate here in Britain as much as is possible. However, that is increasingly easier said than done as our industry has been decimated by every government since the Second World War. This has recently been exemplified by the news that the BRITISH STEEL SCUNTHORPE WORKS IS TO CLOSE leaving our once great nation very much devoid of any major industrial production. This must be reversed to ensure we are once again that great nation we once were.

In the News - 2

The latest anti-British attack comes with news that some SCHOOLS ARE TO CANCEL EASTER. One example comes from Norwood Primary School in Eastleigh in Hampshire. The school sent a letter to parents informing them that their Easter Bonnet Parade and Easter Service will not be taking place this year. Headmistress Stephanie Mander, who sent the letter, has defended the move by saying it was out of respect for diversity. However that is not the worst of it, as in her letter Mander says, "One of the ways we will be celebrating inclusivity is by taking part in Refugee Week which occurs in June, as well as beginning our journey to become an accredited School of Sanctuary". There is already a network of such schools with over 1200 that are apparently creating a culture of welcome, understanding and belonging for those forced to flee. For years the Nationalist community have been aware of the Marxist and anti-British teachings that occur in schools, but now they are even cancelling our traditional festivals. What will it be next – Christmas? There will be those who say this will never happen, but here at Britain, My Nation we are not too sure about that!

Unfortunately THE WAR IN UKRAINE rumbles on and the legacy media provides us with daily updates, apparently. It also divides opinion within the Nationalist community. Many reader's will remember the concerns that the west had in 1962 with the Cuban Missile Crisis as the USSR deployed nuclear missiles in Cuba in response to American deployments in Italy and Turkey. The confrontation is widely considered the closest we have been to a full-scale nuclear war and so parallels can be seen to that crisis with the threat Russia feels to the encroachment of the west ever closer to it's own borders. Here at Britain, My Nation we saw the following on Facebook that was posted on the 20th February, by veteran Nationalist Eddy Butler and we reproduce it here, with his permission, believing it to be a perfect summarisation of the situation.

The Old World Order is in melt down over Trump accusing the Zelensky Dictatorship of starting the Russo-Ukrainian War. They say it is fake news... or is it just a matter of opinion? Russia invaded the Ukraine, that much is obviously true, but what was the casus belli? Was it just because Putin is a mad dictator himself, hell bent on reinstating the old Soviet Empire? If so, why did he wait until 2022?

Israel invaded the Gaza Strip in October 2023. Did Israel start this war? Or was it caused by the large-scale terrorist attacks by Hamas that preceded the Israeli invasion? Or were the Hamas attacks a response to the ongoing Israeli occupation of Palestine following the 1967 6 Day War, or even the 1948 Arab Israeli War? Or the Balfour Declaration? It all depends on your perspective. There is no universal truth.

From Putin and Russia's perspective, the origins of this war lie in the 2014 coup, inspired by the CIA and the European Union, which toppled the democratically elected President of the Ukraine, who happened to be pro Russian. A large proportion of Ukraine's population was pro Russian. This led to conflict and small parts of the Ukraine were effectively occupied by Russia. This uneasy situation persisted with attempts to resolve the matter known as the Minsk Accords. In 2022 Ukraine pulled out of the Minsk Accords and from 2017 had been declaring that they wanted to join NATO. NATO is not a peaceful organisation. It has only been involved in conflict twice, both times as the aggressor, against Libya and Serbia. Since the 1990s Russia was promised that NATO would not expand into former Soviet Block territories. This promise was repeatedly broken, until, through Russian eyes, there was the real and present danger of NATO missiles rocking up on their southern border in the Ukraine. That was the casus belli. The cause of the war. That is why Trump's opinion is valid. You may prefer to believe that Putin is a nutter, hell bent on war and that the Ukraine was minding its own business peacefully. It's all about opinions.

But there are facts. Unless Zelensky and the war mongering blood thirsty European supporters of the Old World Order get their heads around the new reality and stop sacrificing Ukrainian lives in pursuit of their failed Globalist agenda, then the Ukraine will loose more and more territory. It is one way traffic on the battlefield. Without US hardware and intelligence, the Ukrainian army will be slaughtered and there will be a collapse in morale. They must sue for peace. Whoever you think is responsible for the war starting, that is the reality now.

Some readers may consider that British Nationalists have no reason to trouble themselves with this conflict but what with Prime Minister Starmer suggesting that Britain would supply troops for a peace-keeping force and with others mentioning the potential need for conscription, as well as the continuing commitment to fund the Ukrainian war machine it most definitely should be our concern.

How We Won Millwall by Steve Smith – Part 3 of 5

This is the third instalment of an article, by Steve Smith, the 1993 Tower Hamlets British National Party Organiser, that was first published in the, now defunct, Patriot magazine, which ran to 8 issues between Spring 1997 and Summer 2001. Patriot, edited by Tony Lecomber, was very professionally produced and although sadly short-lived, served partly as a vehicle to promote the successful takeover of the BNP by Nick Griffin in replacing John Tyndall. Steve Smith (now of the British Democrats) has kindly given permission for us to reproduce this article which documents one of the finest hours in the history of the British National Party. Bear in mind these events took place when no internet was available and so the achievements detailed are all the more impressive when considering the extent of physical effort required by activists to get public attention.

The ward itself, Spitalfields, was about three-quarters Asian. Our opponents considered that we were contesting the seat to upset Asians and cause racial friction. That wasn't so. Our attitude was that there was still a significant white population in the ward who needed political representation and the opportunity to vote for a party that would defend their interests.

We were moved from our original choice of school as the police considered that in such a sensitive area it would be extremely difficult to guarantee public order. On the day 200 left-wingers turned up, not looking for a bar of soap as you might think, but to cause trouble, which they did. There were several skirmishes, with the first BNP arrivals to the school successfully fighting off a numerically superior force until more BNP supporters arrived to boost numbers and deter further attack. The meeting was a tremendous publicity success with it being the first time a Nationalist party had received extensive television coverage for several years. This helped our recruitment, but whether it helped on polling day is hard to tell.

Our then tactics of mass leafletting and mass canvassing didn't seem to be proving as effective as we'd hoped. On election night, the results in Tower Hamlets were a mixed bag. Two wards, Redcoat and St. James produced disappointing results, being 4% and 3.7% respectively. In the large Holy Trinity ward in Bethnal Green we polled 290 votes, or 9.7% of the vote and this was much better and quite promising. We were also very surprised with our Spitalfields result. Despite being overwhelmingly Asian, we polled 4% which was probably some 12% of the white vote.

The progress since the beginning of the year had been impressive, but despite the activities and campaigns, we still didn't seem to be getting near our main objectives, that being to achieve 10% or more of the vote and eventually winning seats. This was a target we were confident of achieving but tactics needed to be improved.

1990 was a remarkable year in many ways, whereas we thought events would quieten down after the year's early hectic political effort, there was always another issue around the corner for us to be involved in.

A month after the May elections a by-election occurred in Bow. Park ward was last contested by a Nationalist party in 1978. The NF, which was then in its halcyon days, polled 7.6% which was low by their standards then. Therefore, anything near that percentage would be considered a good achievement. As in the May elections earlier we decided to hold another public meeting. This was held on a Monday night and was a relatively low-key affair with limited publicity. Nonetheless, it was effective in that it attracted to its audience, members of the public with no previous political ties.

The real work however, was done on the doorstep. The weekends were set aside for mass leafletting and the weekday evenings were solid canvassing, yet again using the 'home made' style leaflet debating relevant local issues. We came third in that election with the Greens and the Tories receiving utterly derisory votes. The 8.4% we achieved was an improvement on the NF result of 1978 and we felt that our tactics were improving steadily and that our future success in elections would be impressive and the party as a whole would experience an upward curve. Unbelievably, as soon as this by-election was out of the way, then another was called in St. Peters ward in Bethnal Green. We continued with the stratagem employed in the Park ward by-election though this time the mid-week public meeting was a lively occasion generating televised publicity.

The upward curve continued and we received 12.1% of the poll – the best Nationalist result for a decade. An interesting feature transpired in this election. Most patriotically inclined white people had tended in the past to vote Liberal as they were perceived as a party that at local level defended white interests. Because of our intervention we took votes from the Liberals and handed victory to Labour, in a seat which just 4 months previously had a Liberal majority of 800 – quite a high number at council ward level. Thus we had taken part in an election and had a decisive influence on the result. For the first time ever we were 'politically significant'!

How Do We Save Our Decaying Country (Part 8)?

Several times, in this series of articles, we have referred to the NHS, suggesting various ways in which we can improve it. Our health is a subject that we all have major concerns with as we all want to be healthy and also to have confidence that should we experience problems with it, we will get appropriate help. For many years now this has not always been the case. Many people struggle to get the care they need and deserve. GP appointments are, in many areas, very difficult to obtain and so consequently is hospital treatment. Our Accident and Emergency facilities are over-burdened as a result, with regular stories of patients waiting for hours in ambulances and on hospital trolleys before being seen by a medical professional. The infrastructure is inadequate for the number of people wanting to use it. Those over retirement age often seem to be written off, being seen as a burden, or they give up seeking help as they are unable to jump through the hoops that exist with the computerisation of most aspects of health care. Patients in their 90's shouldn't be pushed towards making appointments on-line – it is not what they want and it is wrong to even suggest it to them!

Time after time, governments believe that throwing more and more money at the NHS will put it right but time and time again it obviously does not work. The demand on healthcare very much outweighs the ability of the NHS to meet that demand. We have, on several occasions, previously mentioned the burden that immigration places on our nation and its infrastructure. This is very much the case with the NHS. We should not be treating immigrants – they should not be here! If our country had control of our borders and sent back all of those who should not be here, then it would go a long way to solving our problems with the demand decreasing by several million users. But this would not be the complete solution.

The total structure of the NHS needs a shake-up. This needs to start with improvements to pay and conditions for medical staff, and administrative staff to ensure that sufficient incentives existed to encourage our people to see a career in the NHS as one to which they should aspire. In a previous article discussing National Service we suggested there be an option for young people to spend two years within an NHS setting, thereby providing them with appropriate experience and potentially creating a pool of people that can be drawn upon for employment. At this time we have a great many people of immigrant stock within the NHS who have been employed to fill the void that exists within it. The line “the NHS would have collapsed without immigration” is one that is trotted out again and again, but this is absolute nonsense. If governments over the last 60 years or so had invested in our own people, as suggested above, the need for immigrant workers would never have arisen.

There are other problems with the workforce as it stands, much relating to the trendy employment of DEI (diversity, equity and inclusion) workers and other managers who seemingly serve no purpose. On top of this, all GPs and Consultants would be employed and managed directly by the NHS and not be the independent contractors as now and appearing to be a law unto themselves. This would ensure that their emphasis would be on helping patients and not ticking boxes to meet targets.

The health of the nation should also be a topic taught in schools, so that healthy living, exercise and healthy eating habits were drilled into the public consciousness, so ensuring that the current trend for being fat and lazy became unacceptable and being fit and healthy was the norm. This would reap rewards as the demands on the NHS reduced as a result. On top of this the massive mental health epidemic resulting from a combination of circumstances, including the reliance of young people on the false praise they receive from social media platforms, the fallout from draconian and unnecessary covid lockdown restrictions and the lack of respect they have for self and for each other, would also benefit from a stricter healthy living regime.

Much work would also be required in making improvements to the physical infrastructure of NHS facilities. Hospitals would be built or improved where required, and include for the reintroduction of cottage hospitals that proved so popular but were nearly all closed. GP surgeries would also be located and staffed to ensure they matched the populations they were intended to serve.

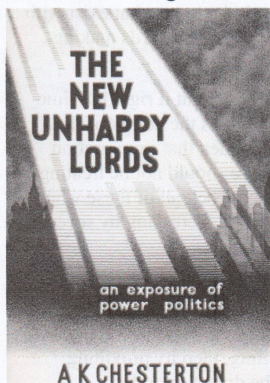

Although the costs for the above measures would be high, the ultimate savings resulting from a healthier population that required less NHS intervention would offset these – our nation would be healthy again, our NHS would be fit for purpose and it would once more revert to its rightful place as the envy of the world.

In our next issue we will look at our social service and welfare system, a system that is being abused now more so than it ever has, and how we can make a start in putting things right.

Recommended Reading on Nationalist Philosophy by Stephen Smith

The following three publications, each of which I will briefly describe, with a few details, are valuable introductions to basic Nationalist beliefs, although not just for Nationalists generally but specifically for young Nationalists.

Those of us fortunate enough to have received authentic Racial-Nationalist, ideological development, in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, acquired the true gift of political education; the creation within an individual patriot of an internal, self-generating motor that ignites Radical Nationalist, thought & deed.

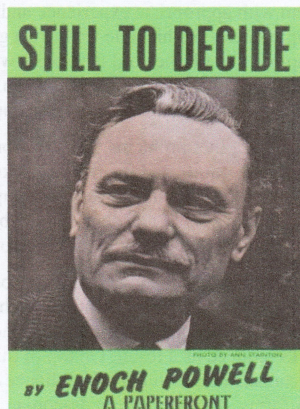

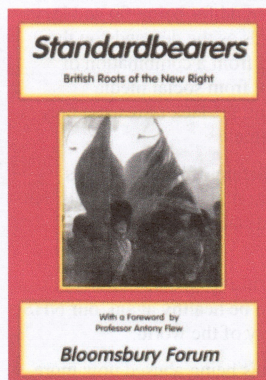

'The New Unhappy Lords' by AK Chesterton, was originally published in 1965. Chesterton won the Military Cross in the Great War, was an acquaintance of Lord Beaverbrook (Express Newspapers) and Policy Director/Chairman of the National Front in 1967. This, his most famous book, details in a 20th century context, the decline of British power and the rise of Internationalism ('Globalism') – something that particularly affects us now. The first chapter of this book, The 'Assault on Patriotism' is recommended. The book is available to purchase online via usual outlets or from Nationalist sources.

For those who don't know, Candour magazine, as advertised on page 19, was started by AK Chesterton in 1953. Edited by Colin Todd, the magazine is still going strong, is published 6 times a year and features a range of articles and features which will be of interest to British Nationalists.

Our next book is 'Still to Decide' by Enoch Powell and was published in 1972. The book is actually a series of speeches by Powell put into print. Although the book was created over fifty years ago, sadly the issues discussed are still with us today. One particular highlight from this book is the item 'Muddle & Malice in the Media & Immigration'. Again, this book is available to purchase online via usual outlets or from Nationalist sources.

The final selection is a relatively recent offering entitled 'Standardbearers – British Roots of the New Right'. This fine booklet published by Bloomsbury Forum in 1999 is a collection of twenty essays, by various authors, being a combination of British Nationalists and National Conservatives, discussing great heroes of Britain's past. Particular highlights from this book include the essays on Joseph Chamberlain and Edmund Burke. As with the above, this can be purchased online via usual outlets or from Nationalist sources.

Whatever your level of interest in British Nationalist politics, the aforementioned subjects are essential study.

(Editor – We hope to include further recommended reading in future editions of Britain, My Nation along with some useful sources in the Nationalist community from which these and other interesting items can be obtained).

Which Nationalist Party? (1 of 4)

Britain, My Nation was founded in an attempt to provide relevant information on the Nationalist organisations that we are aware of, so that, should the reader not already be aligned to or a member of a particular group or party, then they have the opportunity to review those we list and hopefully join one. Generally there is very little difference with many aspects of the parties listed, however the differences that do exist are often crucial depending on whether an individual has ethno or civic Nationalist leanings. This may mean the difference between supporting an organisation which retains the status quo, i.e. will, without change, result in the Great Replacement, or one which will reverse the changes that are being forced upon us reverting our society back to a pre-war make-up. Ultimately our aim is to ensure that everyone is aware of the dangers of the former and awaken them to the only reality that will save us as per the latter option. We hope that all of those aligned to any of the organisations listed will one day come together under the same banner and form a significant force for change rather than remain in generally small groups with no hope of making a difference. Much must be overcome as sadly there are too many who would rather be big fish in small ponds, or who have ego's that will not allow this unification even if it means compromising on a few issues. Will we succeed? Time will tell, but we do detect a surge in interest in what is happening within what is commonly referred to as "the far right". We originally listed all of the groups / parties that we knew of, but it has become increasingly apparent that each has a varying level of influence and so we have begun to reduce those that we list to exclude parties who are either not taking our cause seriously enough or are insignificant by nature of their size and influence. In our last issue we disposed of the British National Party and Patria and gave reasons why. This time we are listing the New British Union and the Populist Party for the last time and the reasons will be listed below. In this issue we also take a brief look at party policies relating to education. News on election candidates is scant as nominations will close on the 2nd April which will be after this edition of Britain, My Nation is published.

British Democratic Party

The British Democrats continue to carry out good work but within very limited areas of the country being very active in some and non-existent in others. The first announcement relating to the 2025 elections was that Frank Calladine will stand as their candidate for the Doncaster mayoral election as well as standing in the local council elections. It remains to be seen if other candidates are nominated and how well they will perform. With a town councillor in Cambridgeshire elected on 47% of the vote it seems the public see the BDP as a viable option so there is a base to build upon, although the growth in membership needs serious monitoring.

The BDP Education policy states that it acknowledges differences in academic ability are attributable to heredity more than to differences in nurture, but see these as differences in kind of ability as much as differences in level of ability. Consequently, the type of schooling received should depend on the abilities of the children concerned. They are in favour of selection but on the basis of vertical divisions between types of ability rather than horizontal divisions between levels of ability with all selections being uniform, flexible and subject to regular reviews. All schools must receive equivalent funding. Primary education must ensure that all capable children, without exception, are functionally literate, numerate and capable of using information technology. Discipline must be restored to our schools, disruptive pupils will be removed and taught in separate institutions. The United Kingdom needs to have the benefits of a new industrial revolution requiring an education system that pushes education in science and technology to the head of its priorities.

Britain First

Despite a popular social media presence and a number of regular physical activities (recent marches haven't resulted in the large numbers suggested), there is doubt in Nationalist circles that the party can drum up the required support, both from members and the public, when needed, and this will be evidenced when and if election candidates are announced.

On education policy BF will implement a 'back to basics' scheme focusing on discipline and traditional teaching methods, as well as focussing on real trades and skills as demanded by a modern, technological and manufacturing economy and the removal of state indulgence in phoney 'social' education subjects. More grammar schools will be created to boost excellence in education and the current obsession with equality will be eradicated. Competitive sports will be reintroduced, as will Christian assemblies and an increased emphasis on the teaching of British history. A subject on Citizenship will be introduced and students will be taught critical thinking skills. University fees will be abolished for less well-off students. Free school meals, milk and orange juice will also be made available for all primary and secondary school students.

British Freedom Party

Despite the party website claiming to be the “UK’s fastest growing party” and with ex BNP chairman Nick Griffin involved, very little seems to be happening to substantiate that claim. The party will continue to plod along making minimal impact on the Nationalist scene. It will be very surprising indeed if any candidates will appear at the May elections, or any other elections for that matter.

No details can be found regarding a policy on education.

British Movement

Although perhaps one of the lesser known of the Nationalist organisations that we list, there is evidence that BM activity is increasing across the country. This is not unexpected when a left-wing government is in power and is performing particularly badly. It is also indicative of a general feeling that, what we call ‘democracy’ has failed as there is no real representation for the people. It may well be that the popularity of the BM will increase whilst Starmer is Prime Minister.

On education the BM rightly believe that our current education system has failed as we cater for those ethnic minorities who will inevitably bring standards down. Consequently they want the education system to be completely dismantled and restructured at all levels. The Movement states it will no longer be run by politically correct liberalism and no longer pander to minority needs and interests. They will ensure that discipline, respect, sportsmanship and a pride in achievement is put back into education.

English Democrats

Only a monthly update seems to be added to the party website and although this should be the first port of call for information on any political party, more can be found on the party X account, which has a relatively small following. The biggest news for the ED’s is that Catherine Blaiklock, (ex Brexit Party leader) will be standing for the party in the forthcoming Runcorn and Helsby parliamentary by-election. This seat has become vacant as a result of ex-Labour MP Mike Amesbury’s conviction for assault. Reform UK came second there in the general election, although Labour did have a large majority, so the ED’s chances of performing well are very slim.

On education, the English Democrats would reduce class sizes, increase teachers’ pay, and improve buildings and equipment. The ED’s will ensure that the school curriculum promotes the teaching of English history and culture as it says that children who are culturally well integrated into their society are more likely to be good citizens, less likely to commit crime and more likely to participate in the community. They say that where there is a demand for it, then schools should be able to free themselves from local education authority control and run independently. They would also provide greater resources for continuing lifetime education enhancing opportunities open to all citizens. The ED’s oppose the lowering of academic standards and examination standards should be restored to a pre-1985 level.

Heritage Party

Despite the party website seeking applications to stand in the local elections there is no news yet of any candidates standing. Good news for the party is that a Kent County Councillor, Becki Bruneau, has left the Conservative Party and joined the Heritage Party.

The party website has no specific policy on education within its manifesto, but reference to the subject appears within other sections. They state that children should be taught British history in schools, and that we are a nation with a history and heritage to be proud of. It believes the state should not interfere with family life and so as parents are the primary educators of their children they have the right to bring up their children as they wish, through home education or in school. The party will not allow schools to propagate anti-family propaganda and enforce that the traditional nuclear family is the best model of family. It will block inappropriate teaching materials and lessons which encourage sexual activity in children before they reach the age of consent. It believes that they should not be exposed to nonsense like queer theory, gender fluidity and transgender propaganda. The party would ensure, as a top priority, that a tripartite system existed at secondary school level with grammar schools for the academically talented, technical schools for those with an aptitude for practical and vocational skills, and general schools to ensure all children have the personal skills, entrepreneurial skills and employability to succeed in the world of work if they leave formal education at 16. Universities would also need to once more focus on delivering high quality academic courses. Academic institutions that force-feed left-wing ideology will have their funding removed.

Homeland Party

The party continues its momentum with a great deal of interest from within Nationalist circles throughout Europe. A huge membership surge was reported recently, with over 500 new members in the space of a month, increasing the total membership to over 1,200 at the time of writing, this increase being mainly on the back of the problems Reform UK are experiencing, (more of which on the next page). Its social media presence continues to increase, with over 40,000 followers on X alone. The party is being courted by major European Nationalists including the AfD, with whom they have recently spent a week during which they received some professional media training and were given a behind the scenes tour of the Bundestag, the German parliament building. The party appears to be taking their role very seriously indeed and their improved media output is something to look forward to. The party also report 2 new councillors, one of which is a sitting councillor defecting from Reform UK, increasing their total to 11. In April the party hosts a conference on the subject of remigration and have named an impressive array of speakers, including Renaud Camus, who coined the phrase The Great Replacement. (Our editor will be attending this conference and so will post a report in the next Britain, My Nation). The party have alluded to standing a number of candidates at elections in May.

The party continues to produce policy documents although education is not yet one of the subjects covered.

National Front

Although party leader, Tony Martin, produces interesting on-line video's in which he attends events organised by and challenges the activities of Hope Not Hate, the so-called charity whose aim seems to be to destroy free speech and the "far right", little other activity occurs. No information can be found regarding the forthcoming elections.

With minimal information available regarding any current policies, we can detail nothing on education.

National Housing Party UK

The party continue with activity on social media but that seems all. No mention can be found regarding possible election candidates for May.

On education the NHPUK will campaign to remove all sex education in all schools and all associated subjects. They believe all sex education since the 1960's has been anti-Christian and no adult other than the child's parents should be teaching them about sexual matters and they continue by saying that the child does not belong to the state.

National Rebirth Party

The NRP continues to make progress announcing a couple of new branches and producing its monthly magazine, issue 7 of which is out now. No details have been issued regarding election candidates however. It seems that the party has a very insular approach and may be on the verge of plateauing. The continual sniping, by leader, Alek Yerbury, at all other things of a Nationalist nature may end up being the party's undoing. The latest is the negative approach to the Marine Le Pen's conviction for embezzlement and the avoidance of reference to the fact this was politically motivated and suggested she deserves this if actually guilty.

The NRP education policy is found in Demand 11 of their 20 point manifesto. They demand there is a continuation of state-funded education and the introduction of schools of excellence, with the best staff, best facilities and best investment, for the more gifted pupils and this will consequently benefit the nation. The party believes the state must ensure all young people have access to an education system, which must equip them for the world of productive work and it must also imbue them with a sense of collective identity, discipline, organisation and mental resilience, ensuring that they are prepared to face the hardships of life equipped for victory. In addition, they believe it should be routine practice that the state finances the tertiary education of people whose chosen profession serves the nation, quoting the example of medicine.

New British Union

The NBU revolved around the activity of leader Gary Raikes who is still unfortunately recovering from illness. Although having other members, it appears to be currently inactive. Despite the party having all good intentions, its insistence on running its organisation on the same lines as a nigh-on 100 year old movement, means that, in this day and age, its appeal is very limited indeed and so the NBU will never attract the following that is necessary to have any influence or impact that is necessary to make the changes needed to save our nation. Consequently we say goodbye to the NBU.

Which Nationalist Party? (4 of 4)

Patriotic Alternative

PA continue with random activities across the country and their social media content is regularly updated, however, their failure to register as a political party with the Electoral Commission means that they will not progress much further in the Nationalist world if they want political influence. It may be they have reached the maximum extent of their reach and it will be interesting to see what progress they make over the rest of the year.

On education policy, item 9, of the PA plan, The Education of our Young People, states that our education system needs a drastic overhaul, a key priority being a reduction in class sizes. British history will become a pillar of a child's education and a shift in focus to practical skills and traditional educational methods, including physical fitness and sport. Non-English speaking children will not be eligible for state education. No politically motivated subject teaching will be permitted, teachers being there to teach, not impart their own political views. Private schooling and home schooling will remain as options available to parents.

Populist Party

Despite a presence on social media platforms there is hardly any activity at all with a miniscule following, so on that basis membership must also be extremely small and, as with the NBU, there is no chance of having any influence or impact to make any difference whatsoever. So we also say goodbye to the Populist Party.

Reclaim Party

Party leader, Laurence Fox, has recently been charged with a sexual offence although this does seem to be politically motivated, so it will be interesting to see the outcome of this. Little activity has been noted nor any indication regarding possible candidates in May's elections.

Reclaim education policy under the heading Reclaim Education proposes a children's charter and includes removal of politically motivated organisations which currently have influence, an end to critical race and gender theory teaching, no sex education at primary school, the banning of political flags, and no drag performances. The value of sport and competition will be recognised. Universities and the like will be returned to intellectually challenging environments and freedom of speech reintroduced to campuses, with funding removed for failure to comply.

Reform UK

Reform UK continue their surge in popularity although recently suffering a hiccup when leader, Nigel Farage fell out with MP Rupert Lowe after he had been critical of his leadership, resulting in his sacking. Consequently, hundreds, if not thousands of members resigned and several branches folded, with other Nationalist parties benefitting with increased membership. Also, possible as a result of the infighting the party's 'biggest political rally for years' did not sell all the tickets available. Ex-Conservative Sarah Pochin will stand as Reform candidate in Runcorn and Helsby. Interestingly, Pochin has previously involved herself in a Refugees Welcome scheme, so her performance in the by-election will be telling as will that of the large number of other candidates standing in May.

Reform UK education policy will include a 'patriotic curriculum' for all schools, with history and social science high on the agenda. Transgender ideology will be banned.

UKIP

Nick Tenconi was announced as new party leader on the 6th March. Tenconi is very much a confrontational leader who enjoys marches, demonstrations and rallies and membership may have risen after the Reform debacle. The website has also had a long-overdue revamp and is calling for candidates for the May elections but currently there is no further news, and it will be an interesting challenge for UKIP to put up candidates.

The UKIP education policy includes support for home-schooling. The party will scrap the national curriculum at primary school level and teaching decisions will be left to individual schools, but must be published. Failing pupils will be held back to allow them to catch up. Politics will be outlawed as will gender ideology and associated issues such as drag artist story-time. Parents will be made responsible for mis-behaving children. The party will restore grammar schools to enable more gifted children to excel. Islamic faith schools will be banned with all children attending state schools, but with no accommodation for the practicing of Islam. Teachers will not necessarily be required to have degrees, as it is no longer deemed a measure of intelligence or ability, and so a probationary scheme will be introduced for new teachers via 'teaching schools' who will also be required to be politically vetted to avoid Marxist infiltration of our schools.

The Best of Spearhead Magazine – June 1977 (1)

In this edition, we reprint extracts from Spearhead magazine issue number 106 from June 1977, in this, our regular feature by way of recognising the best Nationalist publication our movement has ever produced. Again, this issue was edited by Richard Verrall, with Martin Webster as contributing editor and of course, John Tyndall over-seeing publication.

Even though this issue is 48 years old, we can see parallels in the concerns Nationalists had then to those we have now and sadly little has changed other than our situation has become very much worse. Martin Webster's article, as reproduced on page 14, indicates that our path is not an easy one and to achieve our goals we must be patient and be prepared to make the appropriate effort, as we will not win if we do not. That rings very true today and, as mentioned, our situation is so much worse than when that article was written. Consequently our struggle will be harder, but together we Nationalists can and must put things right. The tide is turning across the Western world and will in due course turn here in our favour, but work and make sacrifices we must.

Sadly, we can only reproduce a snapshot of each of the 20-page Spearhead magazines that we feature but even that limited window can still provide us with the necessary inspiration to do our bit for our race and nation.

MARTIN WEBSTER

'LONG STRUGGLE' OUTLOOK STILL NEEDED

IN THE early days of the National Front, when our membership was counted in only a few hundred or a thousand or so, when our funds were almost non-existent and when the public was almost totally unaware of our existence, the party's leadership frequently told members in speeches and articles that they must condition themselves to accept involvement in a long struggle.

After several years of slow and fitful emergence from obscurity the NF started to show modest signs that it was "going somewhere". Bit by bit we grew in membership and influence and we started to realise with pride that our enemies were starting to take us seriously.

Inch by inch, especially during the past two years, we have proved to ourselves and to the public at large that we have got the potential to play a major role in the country's political life.

This task of establishing the NF as a serious and seriously-taken political entity was a great achievement in itself, and as a result of this sense of achievement the exhortations to our members concerning the necessity for everybody to be psychologically prepared for a long struggle have tailed off.

I think that this is a serious lapse in our membership education which must be rectified. I say this not as an anecdote to complacency. I hope nobody in the NF does feel complacent, for our achievements, so far, are only striking in comparison to our pitiful beginnings, not in comparison to the giant hurdles we must leap in the future if we are to become serious contenders for power.

As I see it, the purpose of continually re-asserting the need for all to develop the 'long struggle' outlook (apart, of course, from sorting the sheep from the goats in our new members intake) is to protect our members' morale from a variety of the enemy media's propaganda techniques, the latest and most subtle of which now in operation I can only describe as "False Expectation Creation".

Here is an example of how this technique can work:

The media will pick an area for attention where elections are forthcoming, where it is known NF candidates will be in the field, and where it is well known that the NF, over a couple of years or more has slowly been building up a degree of public support.

To mix metaphors, a place where the NF hasn't yet "set the town alight" but is obviously "sinking down roots". (You could say that this is more or less the NF's situation nationally).

The media will then conduct its own survey, possibly with the assistance of the local Labour and/or Conservative Agents, and will conclude, as with so many goodish NF areas, that the NF candidates will be likely to attract an average percentage of between 8 and 15 per cent. The result of this survey will be kept secret.

Then, as Polling Day approaches, the media will publish "a review of election prospects" which will include a cunning paragraph or two along these lines:

"The National Front candidates confidently expect to achieve more than 20 per cent of the poll in most wards. Informed sources reveal that some NF organisers are saying privately that they would not be surprised if the NF picked up one or two seats."

If they did so, they would be the first victories in the history of the party. Local Labour chiefs admit to being worried by the NF's challenge . . ."

PRESS INVENTIONS

Naturally, this story was written without the reporter ever having had the slightest contact with any of the NF officials or candidates concerned. The whole paragraph is a carefully-contrived invention.

The mention of the NF is not so big that it could cause the public to stampede in the direction of the party – but big enough to catch the attention of the NF candidates and their campaigners.

Human nature being what it is, originally calm and realistic estimates of the probable NF percentage fly out of the window as the gullible victims start to fantasise about what it would be like if they were actually to WIN the election! The publicity! . . . the excitement! . . . the uproar! . . . the fame!

Thus a group of otherwise sensible NF members have had their expectations set for them by their enemies – expectations which are not merely false, but a deliberate 'black propaganda' trick.

When the predictable and very reasonable results are proclaimed, instead of being pleased and proud of their solid political achievement, the candidates and campaigners creep home, after grunting a few miserable comments to press reporters, feeling utterly demoralised.

Next day the media carries a big story: "NF CANDIDATES SHOCKED AT LOW VOTE – National Front candidates were extremely disappointed at the votes they obtained in yesterday's local elections.

Prior to the poll they were confidently expecting to average more than 20 per cent – and some privately expressed hopes of a win.

But when the votes were counted they only managed to obtain an average of 12.5 per cent. This is an obvious set-back for the party."

It has led many experienced political observers to claim that the NF, not just in this area, but throughout the country, has 'peaked' and that it will now slide back into obscurity . . ."

In places where the NF has experienced organisers, they would spot the trick the moment the first 'squib' appeared, and would quickly explain what was going on, re-set more realistic expectations and see to it that all concerned were psychologically prepared for the election count and subsequent press interviews.

But in many areas, as our party is still new and growing, we have Branches and Groups with inexperienced organisers – good people but who, like their members, are utterly naive where press mind-bending tactics are concerned.

What can we do to give the morale of our members – especially the newer members – some kind of 'underseal' as a defence against the kind of media trick I have described?

Indeed, we might ask with equal validity: what can we do to give advance protection to the morale even of experienced members or Branches which quite regardless of any media tricks, happen to have done less well than expected?

I think that in addition to an increased amount of organisational and ideological education at every level in the party, an important part of the answer lies in inculcating our members right from the first moment they join the party with the 'long struggle' outlook.

My blunt version of that outlook is as follows:

If you want instant success; if you require the certainty of victory tomorrow, next year or by any other pre-determined date; if you require month-by-month signs of unbroken and accelerating progress, then the National Front is not the party for you – indeed political life is not for you, no matter what the party.

The National Front exists to serve the cause of British Nationalism, and not as a vehicle for individual ambitions. Therefore the party only wishes to retain as members those who are realistic enough to comprehend the might of the forces arrayed against British national and racial survival and courageous enough to commit themselves to a lifetime's struggle in the service of that cause if necessary.

Without that degree of commitment our movement cannot possibly generate the moral force it must possess if it is to seize successfully its time of opportunity WHENEVER that time comes – next year, or fifty years hence.

How can you expect any great cause to be victorious if you are not prepared to devote yourself unconditionally to its promotion?

JOHN TYNDALL

Jubilee Reflections

TRAVELLING about Britain during the Royal Jubilee celebrations has been a unique experience, awakening in one emotions alternately of pride and scepticism, and finally of quiet and cautious hope. While these emotions are live and fresh, let me record them on paper, since they all touch very directly on the mission of our national movement, as they involve us in our sector of politics more than anyone in any other.

No nationalist could help reacting with pleasure to the very many genuinely spontaneous demonstrations of loyalty to be seen in nearly all towns, large and small, up and down and across our country. In some quite obscure and out-of-the-way places the display of national flags and other motifs in red, white and blue has been spectacular to a degree out of all proportion to local amenities and resources.

So it has been with local festivities, which have attracted the participation of all age groups in large numbers. Perhaps the most moving sights of all have been the great bonfire ceremonies linking British people all the way across the world to far off New Zealand. Running through the entire proceedings, the theme, in all its aspects of words, colour and music, has been one of simple patriotism.

If ever an additional dimension were needed to make me, just for one, come to feel even more emotionally identified with the festivities, that dimension was supplied in the form of the sneers and jeers of the political Left. The very news that Hampstead Intellectualdom had cast its seal of disapproval on the whole affair, and that its familiar scribblers were vying with each other to find the cleverest rhetoric of debunkery to apply to it, was, though hardly a surprise, enough to make one want to rush outside and furiously wave the nearest Union Jack to hand.

I wonder how many of my friends read and reacted as I did to the news that Ruskin College, Oxford, had held its own "Stuff the Jubilee" ceremony, with masses of red flags and a speech by Tariq Ali. The very vision of these pompous twerps, all dirty jeans, whiskers and cannabis, enacting their loathsome rites of national masochism within the precincts of one of Britain's leading cities of culture and learning – that very vision surely must have made the fingers of even the most moderate of us itch for the levers of the nearest available water cannon – or (knowing some of my political companions) something infinitely more lethal!

Then what of veteran lefty sage, James Cameron, who wrote in The Guardian: "Right now I am almost at crisis point in my dislike of the whole thing; I flinch at the sight of primary flag colours everywhere . . . Would there not be some benefit in requiring Germany, say, to share in the maintenance of this absurdly expensive monarchical institution."

To argue with the likes of Cameron that British Royalty is in fact an exceedingly inexpensive commodity for the value we get out of it, and that overseas aid and 'race relations' might provide a far more practical area for their cost-trimming speculations, would of course be a waste of time. Such minds as his are so thoroughly polluted with the toxins of national decadence that facts and figures would be an irrelevance to them. Every institution that symbolises national tradition, heritage and history is to them "aburdly expensive" if it only diverts five-bob away from pet socialist fetishes such as the "underprivileged" and the "Third World".

Altogether, if Jubilee Year had no other recommendation than the bile that it induced in our legions of national denigrators, it would be recommendation enough.

And yet . . .

And yet there is something in the affair that prevents the true nationalist from extending to it the full range of his enthusiasm, something which stifles the urge to cheer and tempers the heartbeat brought on by the sound of patriotic music. This is the feeling of what chasmic contrast there is between such a display of national greatness and the present-day reality of national impotence.

And more than just that, the sense that, from the point of view of the Establishment that promoted it – the rulers of politics, business and the media, the Jubilee might have been conceived as nothing more than a gigantic 'con'.

The corrupt hierarchy of Rome in its period of decay adopted a very clever technique of maintaining their hold over the masses who might have revolted against them: they fed those masses with 'bread and circuses', cheap amusements that diverted the mind and dulled the sense of developing national catastrophe.

With so many parallels between Rome then and Britain now, it is inevitable that the bread-and-circuses one should suggest itself.

We are much more in favour of British crowds standing at roadsides waving Union Jacks than waving red flags; we far prefer the sound of 'Rule Britannia!' to that of 'The Internationale'. But waving flags and singing patriotic songs will not in themselves get us out of our present national mess; that requires determined and sustained political action. We in the NF use flags and music on a considerable scale, but as symbols of our active patriotic zeal not as substitutes for it.

We have little time for those who make patriotic demonstrations on Jubilee Day then go back home and support the parties that have betrayed the British nation at home and around the world.

Equally, I am sure that I speak for all members of the National Front when I say that we want to cheer and wave the flag for this country when once again there is something to cheer and wave the flag about, when we are great again not just in pageantry and tradition but in the real implements of modern power.

There was something faintly pathetic about the Royal procession from Buckingham Palace down the Mall on Jubilee Day – the magnificent old State Coach; liveried footmen; some splendidly groomed horses; regal manners; friendly and loyal crowds; much hunting.

Conspicuous by their absence were powerful detachments from Britain's armed forces, complete with a display of the most up-to-date weapons of land, sea and air. One supposes that there was some logic in this omission, since in the present state to which governments have reduced our forces it is doubtful if we could muster enough men to fill a London street, let alone defend the national frontiers. The hundreds of millions of foreigners who watched the proceedings on TV were doubtless impressed by our ceremonial finesse and by not much else.

Still, as a last reflection on the Jubilee let me end on a positive note. The readiness with which great numbers of ordinary Britons joined in the celebrations did suggest that there is today in our populace a desperate and frustrated hunger for some great form of national self-expression. Let this hunger not be satisfied by mere display, encouraged by an Establishment anxious to promote diversions from the real patriotic task of the age; let it be channelled by our movement into work, action, sacrifice and struggle for a Greater Britain of the future.

And when the Golden Jubilee comes let us really have something to celebrate!

Freedom of Information Act 2000

The Freedom of Information Act 2000 (the FOIA) was intended to create transparency in the public sector and has proved most useful to Nationalists over the years to substantiate claims made by our policy-makers and also for propaganda purposes. This was taken advantage of by the Britain, My Nation editor along with the late Tom Linden, back in British National Party days when they worked together, defining the questions to be asked, of whom, the subsequent managing of the responses and how then to utilise the information to our benefit.

Last time we detailed several approaches and responses made to the Home Office relating to immigrants and crime. In this issue we look at what we deemed a discriminatory practice, the response to which we found most interesting. Note that, although the issue of concern seems a relatively recent one, this exchange took place in 2006, some nineteen years ago. We have had to put up with this nonsense, presumably on a nation-wide basis, for quite some time and it will continue to annoy us.

We contacted Swindon Borough Council to ask:-

1. Does the council have a policy for positive discrimination in respect of ethnic minorities?
2. How does the council manage to by-pass the race equality legislation by holding Asian women only swimming sessions at the Swindon Health Hydro?

The response to question 1 was as follows:-

"I have contacted Nick Stephenson, Change Manager, Equalities and Diversity, to find out if the council operated positive discrimination policy and he said to his knowledge the Council does not have a policy on positive discrimination".

"I have checked with Human Resources and all they can add in relation to employees, is that the council is committed to introducing positive action approaches where ... we have been under-represented by a section of the workforce for a period of 12 months".

In response the question 2, we received the following:-

"For information, I have attached the response I received from Adrian Robinson, Equalities and Diversity Officer – The sessions at the Hydro were established ... because Asian women will not use a public pool where men are present, indeed, for many Asian women, the only real male contact that they have is often their husband, with lesser contact with their father and brothers, therefore being in a state of undress in front of strange men, or being exposed to men in the same state is absolutely culturally unacceptable. It was realised by the recreation services team that they also had an obligation to provide services to Asian women, in the same way that they hold an obligation to all other groups in our society. The decision was taken to segregate one of our five pools once a week, where all female life guards could be provided, at a time of limited use by the community, but acceptable to Asian women. The Race Relations Act has not been circumvented by this action, in fact, in my professional opinion, it, and other government and local provisions, have been better fulfilled by providing a culturally sensitive service in this manner

We saw this as yet another slap in the face to women in general, as we could accept a women only session, but obviously this integrated multi-cultural society they bang on about, is not achievable, as Asian women are given preferential treatment. As said above, it feels as if this issue is quite new, but, given it was nineteen years ago and was obviously planned and implemented before we queried it, so will have been happening for longer. Who knows what may occur in the next nineteen years and so even more reason that we work together to combat it.

Next time we will look at a couple of FOI requests relating to Flag Flying and Council Staff Costs, these being the last examples we will cover from that time. In subsequent articles we will look at more recent examples of questions asked and how in some instances those organisations consulted seemingly try to avoid fully answering or provide inadequate responses.

If any reader has examples of FOI requests with which they have been involved, or have ideas for questions that they would like raised on their behalf please contact us here at Britain, My Nation.

A Time In History

This regular feature will list some events in British history which took place on dates during the months covered by this publication.

Dear Britain, My Nation

According to the first study of its kind, by the Centre for Migration Control, of data from police forces, the Home Office and the Office for National Statistics (ONS), Britain is in the grip of an immigrant crime wave, with foreigners twice as likely to be arrested for crimes than native Britons, and 3 times as likely to be arrested for sex offences. Somalis account for 64.6 arrests per 1000 people, Iraqis account for 92.9 arrests per 1000 people, Afghans account for 106.9 per 1000 people, and Albanians account for a whopping 209.8 arrests per 1000 people. Native Britons account for just 12 arrests per 1000 people, so it is plain to see the particular groups who are making Britain unsafe. The time for Donald J. Trump style mass deportations is long overdue but a change of government is needed first, and hopefully this means a Reform UK government headed by Nigel Farage in 2029, if our weak government led by Two-Tier Keir even lasts that long. Keep up the great work with Britain My Nation. I've devoured every issue I've received since wisely taking out a subscription.

Paul Sheehan - Coventry

Dear Editor

Having recently joined the Homeland Party, and being a veteran Nationalist like yourself, I have found it extremely encouraging that the larger proportion of my fellow members are much younger than myself. Before I joined them I had believed that Nationalism was the domain of the older generation, a generation that has experienced the greatest amount of change over the years, and that we were destined for extinction. This must surely give us all hope that Nationalism is still very much alive and on the up. Many old comrades of mine still seem to be stuck in old-school parties that are just plodding along, and although doing well in their own little pond, they do not seem to be embracing the change that is necessary to fight our battle in this modern age. These are all good Nationalists and I hope that, if reading your magazine, they will wake up to the fact that the public will only warm to something that is new and fresh and make that move, as have I, to help the cause now that we are well and truly into the 21st century. Thank you for taking the time to read this and please keep going with your magazine.

JM - Doncaster

Dear Editor

May I, through your letters page, make a plea for all Nationalists to make the effort to go to their local polling stations on Thursday the 1st of May and vote? It may be that they believe democracy is and probably never has been a process with which they agree, because our first past the post system can never be truly one which results in true representation of the people, as our last General Election proved so well. It may also be that they will have no candidates worthy of their vote. However, unless the system changes, which is unlikely, it is the system in place (for now) and so we have to be involved in it, or, most definitely, nothing will change.
